The relationship between hemopoietic cell differentiation and cytokine regulation has been well characterized in recent years. In previous studies, we have identified hemopoietic stem cells (HSC) in the fetal liver as cells capable of generating both myeloid and B lymphoid cells in in vitro clonal assays. We here show that these multipotent progenitor cells (MPP) express the potential to differentiate into macrophages, granulocytes, monocytes, B cells, plasma cells, and T cells, but can also generate mixed hemopoietic colonies. Their proliferation and differentiation in vitro is regulated by interleukin-7, stem cell factor, insulin-like growth factor II, and interleukin-6, and appears to be similar to the developmental potential of multipotential hemopoietic progenitor cells (PHPC) in bone marrow. In contrast, fetal liver stromal cells were unable to support the proliferation of MPP. These observations suggest a possible role for different hemopoietic compartments in hemopoietic cell development, as well as distinct mechanisms of cytokine regulation of lymphoid and myeloid differentiation.Barbara Karklins Barbara Karklins is a composer, viola player, educational and public musicologist, writer, and music educator.
