Advancement of retinal degeneration--an emerging concept. Rod and cone photoreceptors, as the most important type of neurons in the retina, are responsible for our capability of sight. However, even though the loss of these photoreceptors leads to debilitating visual impairment, there are no effective medical approaches for treating this degenerative disorder. Thus, much effort has focused on the creation of photoreceptor surrogates that can be used to restore vision. Due to their role in visually stimulating behavior, different animal models of photoreceptor degeneration have been employed to develop and test new therapies. As our knowledge on the function of photoreceptors increases, the possibility of harnessing their endogenous regenerative mechanism becomes increasingly feasible. Taking advantage of endogenous regenerative processes offers the potential to overcome many of the problems associated with transplantation and immune rejection of photoreceptors and thus provides a promising therapeutic approach for future clinical applications. This review summarizes progress in the development of photoreceptor replacement therapies and discusses the potential benefits of using endogenous regenerative processes in the advancement of retinal degeneration.
