V1.2.8 Final .Let's face it: we're all nuts here on rainy UK days. Now, in case you were worried about the potential of contracting something from a squirrel's sneeze, we've got some serious reassurance for you. The entomologist and biologist behind this viral video of a squirrel-nibbled mouse's head has assured everyone that the bite can not only save the day when it comes to pesky fleas, but the squirrel itself is "very unlikely to suffer any ill effects". The video, shot over the past few months in Durham, North East England, has been making the rounds on social media. It shows several squirrels catching their claws around a grassy patch and then taking off with a mouse still in their jaws. The mouse remains perfectly intact throughout the incident, as the squirrels seem to be leaving everything alone once they have their precious flea-gift. "As soon as [the squirrel] has its nip on the mouse it releases it as if nothing has happened," the entomologist behind the video, Dr Ben Stone, explained to The New Scientist. "The reason they don't consume it is because it contains an ingredient which essentially makes it almost completely indigestible for them.” He also stressed that they rarely get fleas on them, so a nibble might just be the best way to rid your pooch of them. “Anything they do get from the fox and other dogs and cats, they will get fleas on, but this is almost entirely down to them being bitten by these small animals,” he told the publication. It seems to be the case that the mouse is extremely lucky, as Stone also explained that a squirrel bite will not hurt the rodent in the slightest. ba244e880a
