Monday in the journal Clinical Psychopharmacology, showed that the drug helped reduce flashbacks and sleeplessness associated with PTSD. They also had fewer mood swings and did better with their anger, which is often associated with PTSD. The study was small, but the results showed promise. The researchers tried a few different dosages, and found the one that helped the most produced a longer effect and fewer side effects than the previous standard dose. The researchers are currently going through the FDA approval process to make the drug available to PTSD sufferers, who often don't get adequate relief because of the condition's physical and mental symptoms. PTSD is associated with three times the rate of suicide among veterans compared to civilians. It's also linked to a higher rate of depression, and with veterans, it is often misdiagnosed as something else, such as anxiety or substance abuse. The researchers said that if the drug is approved, PTSD sufferers will be able to take it for the rest of their lives, and it won't cause any harmful
