I recently had a conversation with a colleague about my party's decision not to concede defeat and the need to, instead, show some spine. As we discussed the issue, I could understand the motivation of some in our party to opt for this strategy. After all, we did not have a good opposition day. It is easy to say that we should have contested the elections or at least not conceded defeat. But where to go from here? That is a different issue altogether. There are certainly reasons to contest the election. First, we could make a compelling argument that it was a stolen election. The Conservatives misrepresented and/or deliberately suppressed the results in a number of ridings where they thought they would lose. The fact that the Conservatives were able to affect the results in certain ridings shows how effective their strategy was in winning seats they should have lost. At the very least, this shows that their tactics were outrageous and call into question the legitimacy of the result. If we do not contest the election, it will be assumed that we accepted the results and that we believe that they are correct. The media, our own supporters and even people outside of our party will make that assumption. That is why it makes sense to contest the election. However, we face a second choice as well. We could try to reform the Conservative Party. We could hold a referendum on our socialized medicine model and, if the results were favourable to our platform, we could set a date when the party would move towards that. We could also re-build the party around our ideas. If we realize that we have been outmanoeuvred, we could work on the message and the organization and come back stronger. The alternative is to stay as we are. We can continue to apologize and do our best to prove that we did not accept the result or that it was a stolen election. We can do what we were doing and continue to be outplayed and outgunned. We can accept it and keep doing what we have 2d92ce491b
