The manufacture of microelectronic devices such as semiconductor integrated circuits, flat panel displays, micro-electromechanical systems ("MEMS"), nanotechnology-based devices, and the like, typically involves the repeated application of complex chemical, mechanical, and electrical processing steps. For example, the fabrication of a typical integrated circuit may begin with the formation of a wafer having a large surface area of silicon or other appropriate substrate material. The wafer is then processed to remove unwanted areas of material and thereafter, per wafer, the wafer is cut to singulate the individual dies. The individual dies are then mounted and interconnected in one or more layers to form a final package, incorporating functionality of the device. The individual electronic devices are fabricated in a multi-step process within a clean environment, containing reduced amounts of particulate matter. Such environment is generally referred to as a clean room, and clean room technology has been employed in the manufacture of electronic devices for many years. As the size of the electronic devices has been reduced, however, the equipment used in the manufacturing processes has become correspondingly smaller, allowing the processes to be carried out at even smaller scales. In the manufacture of integrated circuits, for example, individual electronic device layers, such as the semiconductor regions, are created layer by layer on the front surface of the wafer. A fabrication system is used to hold the wafer in a fixed position with respect to one or more fabrication tools.
