In October 2013, when I first wrote about the Slow Money Summit in Albuquerque, I was excited because the event was a success. The crowd of 400 was a broad spectrum of organizers, farmers, business owners, investors, and other stakeholders from across the state. It wasn't a traditional farmer's convention, but a real-world snapshot of the future of New Mexico. I knew I had my hands full covering the event and the stories from the movers and shakers. When, the following month, the General Manager of the Albuquerque Bernalillo County Water Utility contacted me, asking to speak to the water officials who would attend the event, I was initially skeptical. "Water utilities are usually run like bureaucracies," I thought. But they're often tasked with being government representatives that are seen as trustworthy and productive. We always get a good audience, I thought, and I agreed to meet with them to ask if they would like to include them in our story. After my first event, I knew I wanted to include them in our story, and I shared that with the manager. Together we developed an agenda for the meeting. He wanted to speak to the need for the city to work with their rural neighbors to save water. When I asked if he
