Inactivation of tumour suppressor genes is frequently observed in various human malignancies including colorectal carcinoma (CRC). Loss of heterozygosity (LOH) is the most frequent genetic aberration in CRC and results in the genetic inactivation of the neighbouring genes in the short arm of chromosome 9. The loss of expression of tumour suppressor genes in CRC can be caused by hypermethylation of their promoter sequences. In the present study, we examined the relationship between the promoter hypermethylation of the p16 and RARbeta2 tumour suppressor genes in primary CRC and their respective expression levels. We also evaluated the relationship between their hypermethylation and clinicopathological variables. We found a significant correlation between the promoter hypermethylation of
