Today, the entire fetal genome has been mapped and the majority of the developing embryo will receive a copy of every gene. The incidence of birth defects is far higher among children born to mothers with a medical history of diabetes, preeclampsia or receiving in-vitro fertilization. The timing of the window of susceptibility suggests that the same maternal metabolic perturbations during the first trimester may be implicated in congenital malformations. It is not known whether the molecular mechanisms involved in normal development differ in the embryo that develops following conception under conditions of maternal diabetes. We hypothesize that cellular and molecular pathways involved in normal development are misregulated in fetuses produced by diabetic mothers. We propose that embryo development is regulated through a "clock-like" mechanism, and that some maternal insults activate this clock at inappropriate times, leading to abnormalities. A positive feedback system between the fetus and the placenta is required for normal embryo development, and the dysregulation of this system by maternal diabetes may lead to defects in placental and embryonic development. The specific aims of this proposal are: 1) characterize the embryonic expression of maternal diabetes induced changes in clock-like genes using targeted mutant mice 2) determine whether diabetes-induced placental and embryonic defects in clock-like genes leads to congenital malformations and 3) assess the potential importance of clock-like gene products in other maternal insults. These studies will provide new insights into molecular mechanisms by which maternal metabolic perturbations may disrupt normal embryo development and potentially identify candidate genes involved in maternal diabetes induced malformations. The proposed studies will greatly increase the understanding of molecular mechanisms involved in development of the embryo following conception under conditions of diabetes.Hustle, Outdo Your Neighbors With her red hair and spiffy black and white sweater, I'd put Carol Ann DeVita in the fashion business. the tissue samples are collected for biopsy and/or analysis. Samples may be collected from a variety of internal locations, including but not limited to the: armpit; axilla; breast; buccal cavity; buttocks; chest; cervix; chin; colon; ear; eye; eyelid; face; genital tract; gluteal cleft; head; heart; hand; hip; inguinal canal; inner canthus; inner cheek; jaw; knee; labial/oral mucosa; eyelid; lung; lymph node; lumbar spine; mediastinum; mid-axillary line; neck; neck tissue; neck tissue biopsy; oral cavity; outer canthus; pelvis; perianal; pericardium; pharynx; pleura; rectum; retroperitoneal; salivary gland; salivary gland biopsy; sclera; sinus; skin; soft tissue; spleen; sternum; thymus; thyroid; tongue; tonsil; trachea; vulva; vagina; vesicle; vestibule; and/or vagina. In many biopsy cases, a needle is used to collect the biopsy sample. The needle is generally inserted into the body with the goal of reaching a tissue sample. Once the needle has been inserted into the body, the needle is moved to a desired depth in the body, and tissue is subsequently sampled from the tissue site. A spring-loaded mechanism on the needle may then be used to eject the tissue sample, typically with the aid of a stylet or other tissue penetrating member that is inserted into the needle lumen. The biopsy or sampling is performed by the physician or other skilled practitioner using a suitable biopsy gun. The biopsy gun typically has a
