Q: Swift 2.1: How do I pass parameters to a subclass (in a singleton)? I've read that it's a bad practice to pass parameters to a subclass. What I'm trying to achieve is to set a singleton variable (or some sort of global variable) with two values. This is the singleton I have right now:

class Globals: NSObject { static let shared = Globals() private override init(){ super.init() } }

How do I pass the parameters to it when I'm making a new instance of the subclass?

And, If you have any other advice/criticism, please let me know. A: In Swift 2.0 and before you can initialize the singleton in its initializer and keep calling it. Here's how you could do that: class Globals: NSObject { static let shared = Globals() // Initialize a singleton with two parameters. private init(param1: String, param2: String
