It's possible to turn the application into a one-page context menu for each disk folder, yet it doesn't interfere with the other windows and applications. The long-term goal of this application is to understand the molecular and cellular mechanisms by which exposure to environmental agents such as metals, benzene, and airborne particles leads to human cancer. In the current project period, we have explored the molecular mechanisms of the morphological transformation of human cells induced by benzo[a]pyrene (B[a]P) and cadmium. Exposure to B[a]P at nontoxic concentrations leads to the progressive transformation of epithelial cells and ultimately to the formation of colonies of malignant cells. The ultimate step in this transformation process is the induction of anchorage-independent growth in soft agar. We have shown that B[a]P-induced transformation of human lung epithelial cells is accompanied by a dramatic alteration in gene expression and an increase in the level of anchorage-independent growth. To understand the molecular basis for B[a]P-induced transformation, we have characterized the cellular targets of B[a]P and developed a model for its action. B[a]P intercalates into DNA with its pyrenyl ring system and forms a variety of adducts, including adducts with DNA at the N7 position of guanine. We have identified a particular guanine-N7 adduct that plays a central
