Your OSCP certification can take time and hard work. It will probably start over many years. You will deal with rigid boundaries, bureaucracy and control from the state and government organizations. All in all, this can be quite difficult and even brutal work. But you can do it because I believe you can. Remember that this is not an easy game, and not some acrobatic show. It is really a long way and not an easy but very important adventure. To prepare for the OSCP certification, I recommend reading the following articles: 1. Total Security 2. What's New on Vulnerability Tools? 3. The NSA, FBI, FAA and US Secretary of the Air Transportation 4.Study-Microkilo Tunneling 5. Do Access to the Internet Need a Property Certification? This article is a compilation of two other articles that address what professional investigators now consider a requirement for access to digital information in open source systems.The first article covers specific techniques and tools that are common to many public and private information networks. These methods and tools, especially those that go beyond those available to corporate governance, are identified as "noninvasive" and therefore do not necessarily require a "property certification".[6] The second article is targeted towards the security professionals employed by many such networks and attributes the following practices: security mechanisms intended to protect against the over-reach of personalized notices and other forms of retaliation, secrecy notifications, anonymity or anonymizing services, use of in-house computer systems, and, more importantly, noninvasiveness of the network itself. It is worthwhile to take a look at the following points when choosing which type of network to use. Thinking about a network to protect your assets is a good idea. In the face of great popularity of Web sites like Babel Fish, Facebook, Twitter and Google, these networks are emerging as more and more useful tools for individuals and businesses to have access to content and services for their businesses and others. As companies and organizations have moved to Internet applications, they are increasingly building
