
the ability of DC to induce experimental autoimmune encephalomyelitis (EAE) in specific mouse models; and 4) to determine the ability of vaccination with DC to prevent and cure autoimmune disease in different mouse models. We will use a combination of genetic, molecular biological, immunological, and biochemical methods to investigate the function of DC. We are defining the function of DC in normal and disease-associated states, and will then investigate the mechanisms by which DC cause disease. The rationale for this project is that the study of DC will provide insight into how dendritic cells, which initiate immunity in the immune system, cause autoimmune disease. Ultimately, understanding the cause of autoimmune disease could lead to the development of immunological therapies for autoimmune disease, which are currently limited to anti-inflammatory and immunosuppressive treatments.
