The town is trying to keep its market-rate units on the market. "Our whole model is to keep as many units as possible on the market," said Barry Smith, director of Community Housing of Arlington, which includes houses and apartments built on the site in the late 1960s and early '70s. Under an agreement with the city, HUD loaned the town $70 million to build homes that rents to families making up to 60 percent of the area's median income. The town has raised rents on many of the available units, and other units have been sold off, meaning that the remainder of the housing stock must be kept on the market. But with the city's tax abatement now set to expire, many residents say they have been told that they must leave.
