The contract award to Raytheon marks a significant milestone in the Air and Missile Defense Development, or AMDD, program, and represents a new "Breakthrough Technology" award under the project. The ABM project is called the Block V Modular Terrestrial Air Defense System (BMD). "BMD has historically been an integral part of the Navy's approach to the nation's air and missile defense needs, and the Navy continues to need the best technology from the industry to defend the nation and deter those who would threaten our freedom," said Navy Rear Adm. William M. Lohr, Program Executive Officer, Navy Ships, Space and Combat Systems (SPACE). "We are very proud that Raytheon has been selected as our primary contractor for the BMD system, the first new ship class to have been designed around the Aegis BMD system, and one of the fastest warships in the world today," said Navy Capt. Josh R. McClougal, the Spokesperson for Program

Executive Officer, Navy Ships, Space and Combat Systems. "These major systems are essential to the maintenance of a modern Navy." The Navy has awarded a single firm contract to Raytheon to be followed by two foreign shipyards, with a total of 16 awards to Raytheon. Raytheon will be responsible for developing, building, and testing the Block V system for Aegis ships. The partnership will result in the Navy receiving a highly capable, cost-effective missile defense capability; an increase in networked missile operations and the f30f4ceada
