The tapes were made during a search warrant held in abeyance while another search warrant was being obtained for the same premises. The Vachell case supports the trial court's ruling. 53 The trial court correctly instructed the jury that the government did not have to show Appellant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Appellant was entitled to the benefit of all reasonable inferences from the evidence. There was no error by the district court in allowing the tapes to be admitted into evidence. IV. 54 Appellant argues that the trial court erred when it granted a judgment of acquittal on the possession count even though it had allowed the trial to go forward on the conspiracy count. Appellant argues that the government had used Sec. 841(a)(1) to prove the conspiracy. The evidence did not prove that Appellant knowingly or intentionally possessed cocaine. He argues that this is a fatal variance from the indictment. 55 Appellant was charged with conspiring with others to knowingly and intentionally distribute cocaine, knowing it to be a controlled substance. Appellant actually argues that the evidence proved a conspiracy to distribute cocaine to Graham and to resell the cocaine to Lyle. 56 A variance exists only when "the evidence adduced at trial establishes facts different from those alleged in the indictment." United States v. King, 167 F.3d 422, 427 (6th Cir.1999). "It is the defendant's initial burden to prove that the indictment has been constructively amended. The defendant does so by showing either a variance or amendment that prejudices him or her." Id. If Appellant's theory is successful, then his conviction under Sec. 841(a)(1) must be reversed. There was no fatal variance because "a single conspiracy may be proved with evidence of only one overall conspiracy, even though there was more than one conspiracy as defined at trial." Id. 57 Here,
