"I thought," she noted, "when we were talking about health insurance reform that was the population we had in mind, not about people's medical histories. But the point was this: If you are going to mandate that everyone carry insurance, then you have to know what insurance means, because you are mandating that someone carry something that they might not need.” What was the matter with this picture? If you had any doubt about what “mandate” meant, Rachel was about to drive the point home. To make the point clear, Maddow invited Helen on stage. “Now,” she asked, “if you had to get your deductible down to $10,000, would you be asking if you could insure your car or would you be saying, ‘Well, I do not have to insure my car?’” “In other words,” Helen replied, “I can insure my car, I can just drive to work. I would ask for additional coverage, I would want for it to be a deductible of $10,000; and we're supposed to pay for that coverage?" "So," Rachel replied, "do you not want medical history?" "Oh, yes!" Helen replied, "I have a brand-new baby, my dad had colon cancer; I had both knee surgeries; I have two older sisters, both had breast cancer. I've had five mammograms. Now, do I need mammograms? Probably not. But I want a lower deductible. I think if I have to pay for the mammogram then I might get it. The problem is that not all insurance plans have that kind of coverage. You have to ask for it." "I want to make sure I

From MSDN: The GetEnumerator method will throw ArgumentOutOfRangeException if there are fewer elements in the queue than the requested number of elements. Note: this is what I expected to be the case, but I could not find any reference to that anywhere in the source code. So my question is: Has MSDN got anything wrong, or is this behavior simply undocumented? A: The documentation is correct and documented correctly.
From the sources, I see that indeed a check like GetEnumerator(.., n) will throw if n The present invention is a form of radio control aircraft which can be piloted safely by an instructor, and which can be learned to fly safely by a beginner, with no loss of control, in a matter of minutes. Certain large, four-bladed, ultra-light weight aircraft are known, and may be single-seaters, or multiple-seaters. However, these aircraft employ several controls, for example rudder, elevator, aileron, flap- and slat-operations for manoeuvring, and counter-rotating stabilizers, and are thus rather difficult for a beginner to master. In addition, the control surfaces must be synchronized together, and there is considerable danger of injury from the control arm, when moving rapidly over the surface of the aircraft. Other small two-bladed, radio controlled aircraft are known which are basically "joysticks" in which the controls are mounted on one stick, and the pilot's controls are mounted on a second stick. While these aircraft are relatively easy for a beginner to learn to fly, they are not entirely safe to control, since
