Roger Federer gave a surprisingly candid interview with The Australian last week, revealing that he gets fed up of being the face of Swiss tourism. The 33-year-old played a feature in the paper, where he admitted to feeling unhappy with the continued worldwide acclaim of his achievements and the "Never Give Up" mantra. Federer spoke about his struggles in the last few years and his desire to be appreciated for his tennis: "I don't have any bad feelings about the whole balance of everything. "No, I am more happy than not. "I like the balance of everything, it's all good. "The only thing I am not too happy about is the foundation of it, my name, my brand, when people say 'Roger Federer' they think of the tennis, not of the foundation of it." The tennis great then went on to speak about his relationship with the media and the interest surrounding his personal life, revealing that it can lead to problems for other people. When asked if he sees a negative side to fame, he said: "I think if I am honest I feel like a marketer, I like to promote whatever I am doing. "It is more that other people connect with it than me. I am so selective, I am so positive, and I have so many things, I do not have time to look at what people say about me. "If I can spend 30 seconds at a time thinking about it, I will think about it. "But it is not that big a burden for me. "I do not have a desire to be famous, at the end of the day I just do the job." This isn't the first time Federer has spoken about the attention he receives. The world number one took the stage at the London Classic earlier this year, where he was interviewed by a writer from The Telegraph who asked if he sees himself as a role model. Federer said: "I am a role model, I have always been, but I am not a hero. "I just try to be myself. "I try to be honest, and I try to be open, and I try to be myself. "And I think everyone wants to be accepted and not to be judged.
