In the present study, the importance of dietary cholesterol as a risk factor for the development of atherosclerosis and coronary heart disease was reevaluated. The relationship between dietary cholesterol and the occurrence of cardiovascular diseases was discussed in the light of the present knowledge about cholesterol metabolism and cholesterol-lipoprotein metabolism. While most of the cholesterol in the blood is derived from exogenous sources, that in the body depends on endogenous synthesis. The effects of dietary cholesterol on atherogenesis have also been discussed in relation to experimental diets and animal models. The current knowledge of cholesterol metabolism is summarized and compared with findings in regard to the effects
