I'm using JAXB to read some XML files generated by another system, so the structure is somewhat different from the one I'm used to. So I'll try to give you the details. Lets say I have a class that has a field like this: @XmlElement(name = "id") protected Long id; The xml would be something like this: 0 In my class I would have a property like this: @XmlElement(name = "id") protected Long id; This would not work, because the XML is not the same as the Java class, and the Java class won't know how to read the id property. If I change the class and the field, like this: @XmlElement(name = "id") protected long id; then of course the Java class would work, but the XML would be wrong. So how should this be handled? A: Your class design is incorrect. The id field has to be a Long. class MyClass { Long id; } If you need to wrap the Long value inside a wrapper, then that is a different question. JAXB can do that, but you have to define a wrapper class. class MyClass { Long id; class MyId { public Long getId() { return id; } } MyId id; } Another option is to define two classes, one for the wrapped value and one for the wrapped value. This would force you to use Java Generics to consume the object. 595f342e71
