serial error code. The watch command however does not, and thus does not produce a log of exactly what npm is doing. It is also my understanding that there are cross process error codes, but this seems to be device specific, and thus not relevant to my problem.

The problem here is that my program is generating "warnings" but not "errors" which cause the "watch" command to take awhile to run (sometimes 30+ minutes). In some cases it get stuck there, preventing it from running any more debug. The question is two parts: How do I tell what the error code is (am I just using the right command), and what do I need to do to get around this? Should I just kill the process that is generating the warnings, or is there some other better way? Note that I'm running the node process in the remote. A: The answer is to use another process monitor, such as top.

If the command "top" (or whatever your OS's equivalent is) is set up to monitor a single process, then watch will work as expected.

Interior to move in Andrew Harrer/Bloomberg News Larabee says his family's been living in New York since before the settlement (his kids take the Metro-North to and from the city's commuter rail hub) and miss the quiet. He says he's heard New Yorkers are quiet because they're embarrassed that they're trying to speak English, and that people from New Jersey speak more than the average New Yorker because "they think it makes them cooler."

Larabee says with

@kh_ux_naQ: HTML, CSS: select element by its inner HTML using vuejs I am trying to create a select that accepts the user input and displays on the page. Here is what I have tried: new Vue({ el: '#app', data: { code: '1', }, methods: { onChange: function() { this.code = ["", this.code, "].join(""); } } });
