Writing a resume for your first job after finishing college For people just out of college, the first job after graduation is no small feat. It's a task that you've not only been preparing for since you were in school, but one where you're being judged on the day you are hired. According to Mercer, one of the leading job analysis consulting firms, they estimate that it takes about 15 hours to write a good resume. After a few weeks on the job, the average worker has no idea if his or her resume is helping you (or not) or where else to improve it. Try and aim to do it in at least a half a day with the help of this guide to writing resumes. Otherwise, you are making your job at the first company that hires you that much harder. 6 steps to writing a resume that actually works STEP 1: Pick a Job Target This is a crucial step that can have a tremendous impact on the outcome. Focus on what you're passionate about and put that on your resume as your job target. You can also pick the job that you like the job and are good at. -What do you do? Sometimes when you're finding a job, people just happen to look at your resume first. Most of them don't even look at your cover letter. Every resume we've seen has some connection to the word "job" and it can be challenging to find a job that has nothing to do with what you want. For the most part, people are looking for job experience and job skills. So, if you want to be a web designer, make sure to find a job that has to do with web development. The same applies for any of the other niche fields: -If you want to be a tax accountant, find a job that deals with taxes. -If you are a certified public accountant, find a job that has to do with tax preparation. -If you want to be a roofing contractor, find a job
