Other examples of inorganic materials that can be used as antifogging agents include various metal oxides, such as indium tin oxide (ITO), and tin oxide, and metal nitrides, such as TiN, TaN, AlN, TiAlN, HfTiN, and ZrN. However, ITO is not sufficient to maintain antifogging properties for an extended period of time. Tin oxide and metal nitrides are disadvantageous in that they are very expensive and they can form hazing due to atmospheric gases. Therefore, there is a need to provide an antifogging agent that does not cause toxicity, is inexpensive, and maintains antifogging properties for an extended period of time. This invention relates to control circuits and more particularly to a digital to analog converter control circuit. It is known to use one or more digital to analog converters (DAC) as the function generator in a digital potentiometer, in which a digitally encoded signal is applied to a DAC. In this case, the DAC converts the digitally encoded signal into an analog output which is in turn applied to the control element of the digital potentiometer. The analog output thus controls the position of the control element. Although the invention is not limited to this type of configuration, the digital potentiometer is the preferred embodiment and the preferred embodiment will be described with reference to this type of configuration. However, it is also known to use a DAC as a control signal to switch
