Jeff Sessions, the ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, said Tuesday the sequester will worsen the budget problems facing Social Security and Medicare but won't affect other federal programs. Sessions said that's not really what a "sequester" means. The term refers to $85 billion in automatic cuts to defense and domestic spending that will occur over 10 months unless Congress enacts a deal to replace them with a different combination of cuts and tax hikes. Sessions said sequestration is not a cut but a reduction in the rate at which government programs grow -- and if any of them shrink. Since a wide variety of spending is affected by the cuts, Sessions said, "No one program is being cut, but all programs are being reduced." The senator said these results "are not a cut, because reductions in spending occur automatically without any action on the part of the president or Congress." But he said the effects of the cuts will come as a "painful shock" because it will not be clear where the money will be taken from until late March. "It is putting a strain on the agencies, but it's not a cut," Sessions said in an interview on Wisconsin Public Radio. "It will have no effect on social security payments or anything else in other programs. "They will pay less of what they're supposed to pay to Social Security but will have to pay the same to other programs," he said. "So basically, their payments will go down and they will have to pay that to other programs." The cuts could force layoffs of some federal employees, such as air traffic controllers, federal inspectors of meat products and meatpacking plants, weather forecasters and others, said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., who has been involved in budget negotiations on both sides of the Capitol. But he said he's not sure how Directed by K.Characterization and functional analysis of the insecticidal protein P11 of potato virus Y. The type species of the family Luteoviridae, potato virus Y (PVY) is the most economically important virus of potato worldwide. The virion-encoded protein P11 is an RNA-silencing suppressor, and it has been shown to have an insecticidal activity against Lepidoptera insects when expressed alone. In this study, the gene encoding P11 was cloned, and it was expressed in Escherichia coli and then purified. Insect bioassays showed that the recombinant P11 protein induced a lethal phenotype in the tobacco hornworm (Manduca sexta) larva. Further studies of the insecticidal activity of P11 were performed by using RNA interference. The results of knock-down of P11 expression in the BPH by RNA interference assay showed that P11 expression was essential for PVA silencing and the suppression of RNA interference in the BPH. When the BPH were fed on potato lines expressing P11, the larvae were unable to survive, suggesting that P11 protected the host from BPH-mediated gene silencing. These data indicate that P11 may be a novel potential tool for the management of BPH insect pests.

The effects of prolonged administration of apomorphine in the dog. III. Changes in dopamine metabolite concentrations in the spinal cord and pituitary. Following induction of anaesthesia with Nembutal, the in vivo concentrations of DOPAC, HVA and DOPEG, as well as DA and 5-HIAA in the spinal cord and pituitary of dogs were determined before and at 2 h, 24 h and 7 days after continuous subcutaneous administration of apomorphine hydrochloride (0.1 mg/kg/h). It was found that the concentration of dopamine in the spinal cord remained unchanged; however, in the pituitary it was significantly reduced. 5-Hydroxy-DOPA and DOPAC were found in both the spinal cord and the pituitary; 5-HIAA was found in pituitary, whereas DOPEG was not detected. The concentration of HVA was significantly increased in the spinal cord, but was unchanged in the pituitary.// //
