Spear head force The term spear head force is used to refer to the dynamic force that a projectile (such as a spear) would experience before contact with a target. It is the force needed to continue a projectile beyond the initial point of impact. It can also be the force that must be overcome by the projectile if it is to penetrate the target. History In Classical and Medieval times, the term was used to describe the force needed to continue the movement of a spear beyond the point of initial contact with a target. The spear head force was usually measured by the force that a spear would need to be shoved through a target such as a human or armour. The reason that spear heads were used to measure force, is that during the time period, spears were commonly made from wood or composite materials and therefore a spear could not be calibrated against a different object. Modern use In modern use, the term is used to describe the peak force needed to push an object such as a spear or arrow through some sort of medium, like wood, ice, dry-docked water, etc. This is primarily a military term, although spearhead forces are important in many other contexts as well. For instance, high spearhead forces are needed to push through ice, which can be used to enhance the stealth of a submarine. I'm hoping that we will get more better and much more interesting chapters soon... I can't wait to see the end of the story ; ; I really love the speedrun style chapter where everyone becomes best friends instead of enemies. The protagonist who became a mortal enemy for the rest of his life became best of friends with his enemy
